LOOKING FOR AN ARTICLE IN THE CAMBRIDGE/CAMBRIAN MEDIEVAL CELTIC STUDIES JOURNAL

The plague rages among us, or so we are assured by the mass media. My local library has closed after a librarian had a close encounter with someone later found to be infected. There's no question of visiting a research collection. So ... what you are about to do, do it online!

A kind correspondent sent me a couple of articles relating to St Austell. There is a Tenth-century list of Cornish saints' names in a Vatican manuscript, it turns out. In fact the manuscript is online! But the publication of it is in an obscure journal: the Cambridge Medieval Celtic Studies series, volume 12 (1986). Another correspondent believes that he has access, so it may appear that way.

But the journal turns out to be very obscure indeed. It is abbreviated CMCS, and there is a website here. The journal has now become the Cambrian Medieval Celtic Studies series, and is now based, not in Cambridge, but in Aberystwyth. It's clearly a fine journal, in an obscure, difficult-to-work-with, area which is not really being supported that well by the academic community.

Thankfully copies of the journal are not expensive, and I have simply ordered issue 12 to be sent to me. Let's see if anything turns up!
